

Thought leadership. The future of documents.

François Ragnet,
Managing Principal
Technology Information
Xerox Global Services

When dynamic documents and social media converge, the results will change the nature of knowledge work. And it's happening right now. Want to get some ideas about how to leverage these powerful new information tools? Listen in as I sit down with Andrew Nachison founder of We Media and iFOCOS, the Institute for the Connected Society, for a Xerox Thought Leadership Executive Exchange podcast.

We discuss how the changing nature of the document, and the impact of social media enable a new kind of workplace characterized by real-time knowledge sharing and perpetual creativity.

<http://www.xerox.com/thoughtleadership>

What are the implications for individual knowledge workers and organizations? How will they deal with conflicting issues such as abundance of information and the need for relevance? What about the security of information and privacy in a world of cloud-based computing, and open access to information?

Andrew Nachison,
Founder of We Media
and iFOCOS

Andrew and I cover a lot of ground in this four-part podcast designed to spark your imagination and catalyze your own conversations. I hope you enjoy it.

Part One

*What is a document in the age of social media?
Is it time to update your definition?*

Part Two

How will "social documents" impact organizations and knowledge workers?

Part Three

*What are the social implications of virtual work?
Is there a clear vision for a cloud-based, app-driven workplace?*

Part Four

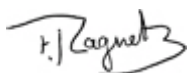

What will become of security and privacy in an information overloaded world?

Or listen to the entire conversation here.

If you would like to read more about The Future of Documents, download my latest white paper, "Can you trust the cloud?" or visit my Thought Leadership page and sign up for my blog.

Let me know what you think about this podcast, be sure to share it with your colleagues, and if you have a Future of Documents topic you'd like me to discuss, please pass it along.

Sincerely,

Francois Ragnet